<sup>1</sup> Food specialists around the world often speak about the importance of a balanced diet. However, I think that finding the right balance in food is very tricky. A balanced diet usually means eating more fruits, vegetables, and grains and consuming fewer foods high in fat, sugar, and cholesterol. When comparing the food habits of different cultures, however, the definition of a "balanced diet" might also be seen differently. For me, a person's culture can influence the way he tries to find balance in the foods he consumes. Cultures might view balance differently according to the way a dish tastes, or how a meal is prepared and served. Looking at the concept of a "balanced diet" through the eyes of two very different cultures makes it clear that the definition can differ greatly.

<sup>2</sup> For the Italians, balance does not come only from using different kinds of ingredients; enjoying the tastes of the country's many regions can also make their diet feel balanced. Italy is divided into 20 regions. Each region has its own local cuisine and food traditions, or what the Italians call tradizioni. The Italians embrace all 20 regions and the cuisine produced in each. Italian cafés, restaurants, and food advertisements often refer to the different regions, and to the fact that Italian people find pleasure in eating foods from different parts of the country in a search for balance.

<sup>3</sup> Everyone likes eating Italian foods like pizza and pasta. One can also see balance in the way the Italians serve their food. Food research shows that a traditional

<sup>4</sup> Like Italian cuisine, traditional Japanese cooking also tries to find balance, but in a different way. The Japanese believe there are two different types of foods, which work together to create harmony in a dish. According to this principle, foods like carrots, water, and tofu are "cool" foods because they decrease body heat. In contrast, foods such as chicken, eggs, and mushrooms are "warm" foods because they increase body heat. When a dish has an equal amount of warm and cool foods together, it is considered balanced. Likewise, opposing cooking methods balance dishes. Boiling and steaming are water-based, so they contrast well with frying, an oil-based method.

<sup>5</sup> The challenge in traditional Japanese cooking is to prepare and eat meals that balance these opposing properties. The Japanese believe that achieving this kind of balance can result in improved health. For instance, dishes like beef with broccoli and sweet and sour chicken are considered healthy because they have a mix of foods, colors, flavors, and textures. For the same reason, a warm dish like fried rice might be eaten with a cool fruit such as watermelon. The Japanese believe diseases occur when there are too many cool or warm foods in the human body. For them, food acts as medicine. A person might have heartburn because he or she is eating too much spicy food. As a result, a doctor might suggest drinking iced tea, a cool drink, to balance the extra warmth.

<sup>6</sup> Italy and Japan have very different cultures, and people in each culture have their own ideas of what constitutes a balanced meal, whether it is tastes, menus, ingredients, eating habits, or nutritional benefits. What connects the two, however, is a shared desire to find some kind of balance. A look at their food preferences also suggests that culture and food are not separate from each other. They are closely related, and their connection can be observed around the world in very different and fascinating ways.

Question 4 :

According to the article, which of the following is TRUE?

1 The famous saying "no one likes change" is debatable. However, whether we like change or hate it, I believe we all have our own way of dealing with it. While some people relish a change in circumstances, others worry about how they will cope with new situations. While some love the challenge of "the new," some hate the inconvenience of getting to grips with something different. In reality, it doesn't really matter where we stand or what opinion we have about change, because we all adapt.

2 According to research, human beings are highly adaptable creatures. We can survive in freezing temperatures. And we can still get on a plane to hot and humid climates without a problem. Humans can survive living on their own and yet attend big parties or family events. Most of the time it's simple: we assess a situation and behave or adapt to it accordingly. This is true of the way we live and how we deal with change in our lives, but it is also true of how we react to change in our surroundings.

3 Take technology, for example. The sheer rate of technological development could have left us astonished and bombarded. But it didn't. Actually, the opposite is true. We have adapted so quickly to these new technologies that somehow we are less and less surprised about the new wonders of technology that we see on a daily basis. More important, though, is how we have integrated these technological changes into our lives so effortlessly that most of us haven't realized it, and more of us can't even remember a time when we weren't using these kinds of technology.

4 Ten years ago, we were able to use mobile phones, text messages, and laptops. Today though, we think nothing of making a video call to a friend, updating our social networking sites or downloading the latest smartphone application to share music or files. The truth is that however fast technology moves, we will adopt it and adapt to it at the same pace. That is to say that we can, and most of us do. But just because we can, doesn't always mean that we want to.

5 Recent studies indicate that there are varying degrees of acceptance and resistance to areas such as new technologies. Many young people can't wait to get their hands on the latest gadgets, while some use these new advances just because they're available and can make life easier. There are also others who can't see the point of new technology and are happy with older technology that seems to work well. So where does this divide come in? Generation plays a big role in how new technology is received. For these types of people, new technologies like this often strike them as being unnecessary as well as complicated to learn about and use. Other generations can

Generation plays a big role in how new technology is received. For these types of people, new technologies like this often strike them as being unnecessary as well as complicated to learn about and use. Other generations can appreciate new technologies for the convenience they provide. Then we have the younger generation who are intrigued and interested in technology, and are the ones growing up with cutting-edge technology that has never been seen before.

6 The way different people and age groups adapt to technology is just an example of how change affects us. Even though we may have varying degrees of how willing we are to accept these changes, the truth remains that we always adapt. Whether that means giving up on CDs and opting for MP3s instead, or even just being aware of the new gadgets on the market, we never fail to adapt to our surroundings and the influences around us, and that's what makes humans experts in adapting.

Question No. 1

Read the introductory paragraph to an opinion essay. Which is the best thesis statement for the essay?

Many people hate commercials because they interrupt the YouTube videos or TV Shows they watch. However, I think that I'm different from most people because I enjoy watching commercials. In fact, I think the commercials are almost as good as the shows I'm watching. Unlike many people, I never leave the TV or my laptop to go to the bathroom or get something to drink when a commercial comes on. I'm the one paying attention because I think commercials are great!

- I hate commercials because they interrupt my favorite YouTube and TV shows.
- YouTube advertisements are different from TV commercials.
- I am different from people because I like commercials.
- Most people hate commercials because they are annoying.
