

Read the paragraph and answer the questions (1-2):

I am not the type of person who can multitask, for example, talk on the phone, shop online and cook dinner all at the same time. Does this mean there is something wrong with me? I googled the subject and felt a little better. It seems, after all, that the human brain can't do several things at the same time: it can only switch quickly from one task to another. If you try to do several things at once, experts say that you simply do each thing less well. According to workplace psychologist Steven Nguyen, we should stop worrying about multitasking. 'Concentrate on what you are doing and do fewer things better,' he says. Now that's advice that I'm happy to follow!

Answer the following questions:

a. What does the word 'multitask' mean?

b. Who is Steven Nguyen?

c. What, according to the text, human brain can do?

Write T for true or F for false statements:

a. We should stop worrying about multitasking, says the author. ()

b. The author googled the subject and felt a little better. ()

c. Concentrate on what you are doing and do many things. ()

d. Human brain can't do several things at the same time. ()
