

A: Read the text then do the tasks below:

From krill to great whales, creatures which live in the ocean are subject to countless threats, most of which are anthropogenic in origin. Though the oceans may seem endless, they are not considerably flexible. Humans have interacted with the oceans for millennia, but the past several centuries have seen a dramatic acceleration in our influence, as we have become more industrialised. Energy exploration and development, pollution, coastal development, and ocean noise and collisions from increased ship traffic are all having dramatic impacts on marine life. Destructive and unsustainable fishing operations and trade in marine species create a serious threat to the ocean's biodiversity. Sharks, the most dangerous predators key to healthy ecosystems, have faced steep declines due to years of harsh exploitation, including the brutal practice of fishing them.
