Question No. 1

1 The food that you see in advertisements looks perfectly delicious, thanks to the work of a food stylist. Food stylists are like make-up artists. It's their job to make you believe that the food you see in advertisements is great. Unfortunately, the food you buy never looks like it did in the picture. Many food businesses, such as restaurants and food companies, hire someone called a food stylist to help photograph the foods that they sell. The reason the "real" food might look different is because the food stylist uses "deceptive tricks" to make the food look better, and many of the things they use are not even edible.

2 Take a simple burger as an example. To get the perfect-looking burger, food stylists have to use deceptive tricks. They will often use a partially cooked burger patty because it will appear plumper. But how do they get that just-cooked look? Well, a useful tool is a small blowtorch, which can burn marks into the burger to make it look like it was grilled. Brown food coloring and some oil are then painted onto the burger to make it look yummy. Now it's time to figure out how to photograph the burger. Photographers might need hundreds of buns before they can find the "perfect" bun. And if it's a sesame bun, they'll need a pair of tweezers to glue on the sesame seeds in just the right spot. Often the bun is held in place with toothpicks, so it won't move. Paper towels are placed under the burger so that it doesn't drip all over the bun and make it soggy. Finally, a perfect piece of lettuce, without any holes or brown spots is chosen and sprayed

Supertasters, Nontasters, and Diet

As a rule, humans avoid foods that taste bad and eat foods that give them pleasure. Since supertasters avoid bitter fruits and vegetables, their diets are sometimes not balanced, which could put them more at risk for certain types of cancers. However, they also dislike fatty and sweet foods, so they tend to be thinner and at lower risk for heart disease and diabetes. In contrast, nontasters like foods high in fat because their tongues do not react negatively to them. All people should pay attention to what they eat. However, nontasters and supertasters must be more aware of the foods they are consuming or avoiding and find other ways to make up the difference.

What Kind of "Taster" Are You?

If you can identify which kind of taster you are, you will be able to make more educated choices about your diet. This simple test can show whether you are a nontaster, medium taster, or supertaster. Put a small amount of blue food coloring on your tongue. Take a piece of notebook paper (the kind with three holes punched out), and put one of the holes over your tongue. Your taste buds will look like little pink bumps on your blue tongue. Count how many bumps you see in the hole. If there are 15 bumps or fewer, you are a nontaster. If there are 35 or more, you are a supertaster. If there are between 15 and 35, you're a medium taster.

- If there are 51 bumps or fewer, you are a nontaster.
- The taste buds send messages to the nose as chemicals from the food enter the brain.
- Medium tasters think that a lot of foods are too strong.

Mountains began to consume my thoughts. Secretly, I wanted to do something significant to help change the image that friends and family had developed of me. I had been cast in the role of patient. In spite of being very good in that role, I hated being a patient and desperately wanted to change my image. I wanted bruises to be earned from sports related activities, not from needle pricks and aspirin-thinned blood. At this stage, my self-image was as important to my well-being as anything else. If, I figured, I could rebuild my strength and regain at least some of my former athleticism, an improved image would naturally follow.

I set a goal—to hike the 1,100-meter ascent of Table Mountain in Cape Town. I was drawn to this destination by its beauty, a beauty not because it was perfect, but because it was imperfect. Table Mountain's shape is unforgettably distinctive because it's broken. If it were whole, it would lose its uniqueness. The spirit building message wasn't lost on me. Just because I wasn't perfect didn't mean I couldn't stand as tall and mighty as anyone else.

In August of 1999, just nine months after my heart replacement, my husband Justin and I began to hike the trail leading to Table Mountain. The trail began with a mild incline, which we eagerly took at a brisk pace. I was winded at first, but as soon as my heart caught up with me, I felt energized. I tried to go as fast as the other hikers, but found it difficult to keep up. The canyon had many steep slopes and

Knowing Your Tastes

1 Food Likes and Dislikes
Why do some people love spicy food and others hate it? Why do many people dislike broccoli? Why do some people want candies or chocolates all the time? Human taste is not as simple as liking or disliking something. The kind of tongue you have can affect your food choices—and your health.

2 How the Tongue Works
The human tongue is made up of a group of muscles and taste buds that work together to recognize taste. The average adult tongue has 12,000 taste buds, which are tiny bumps located on the tongue. Tiny hairs on the end of the taste buds tell us whether food is sweet, sour, bitter, or salty. The taste buds send messages to the brain as chemicals from the food enter the nose. Together, the taste buds and nose tell the brain exactly what the tongue is tasting. This complex system helps humans survive by recognizing which foods are

Eat Right

² The Japanese are known for having healthy diets and lifestyles. The secret of the Japanese diet is that they eat low calorie foods and control their portion size. They also eat out of small dishes to help them control how much they eat. They eat slowly and try to enjoy their food. This way it gives their brain time to realize that they are full. The Japanese avoid foods like chocolate, potato chips, and cookies. Instead, they eat many fruits, vegetables, and soups. Culturally, the Japanese love to eat fish all the time, even for breakfast! The Japanese also enjoy fish like salmon and tuna. This means that they eat less red meat which has a lot of fat.

¹ Thanks to modern technology, cars today think for us. GPS navigation systems give people directions without looking at a map. Sensors built into cars sound an alarm if drivers get too close to a person or another vehicle. Now, car companies are building driverless cars that will do all of this, and much more. Driverless cars may sound like science fiction. However, they are already on the roads in some places. We would like to hear your opinion about this. Is this a good thing?

Eat Right

² The Japanese are known for having healthy diets and lifestyles. The secret of the Japanese diet is that they eat low calorie foods and control their portion size. They also eat out of small dishes to help them control how much they eat. They eat slowly and try to enjoy their food. This way it gives their brain time to realize that they are full. The Japanese avoid foods like chocolate, potato chips and cookies. Instead, they eat many fruits, vegetables and soups. Culturally, the Japanese love to eat rice all the time, even for breakfast! The Japanese also enjoy fish like salmon and tuna. This means that they eat less red meat which has a lot of fat.

⁷ This is a really interesting discussion. I don't know whether driverless cars are a good thing or not. They will probably make the streets more organized. They will stop young people driving like racing car drivers. However, many people enjoy driving, and use it as a way to relax - and think about problems. Driverless cars will prevent people from doing this. This is my opinion, I could be wrong.

⁸ Driverless cars are excellent. In a hands-free car, people can respond to email without worrying about hitting another car. Also, driverless cars will use less fuel. They don't need to be as heavy because they are less likely to crash. Tesla has already started manufacturing these cars. I hope they are not too expensive because I want to get one as soon as possible.

5 I don't think driverless cars are a good idea. Automated cars cannot anticipate the unexpected like humans can. They might not recognize when a police officer tells traffic to stop or pull off the road. Also, driverless cars may be too polite on the highway, where many people speed. A car that is following the speed limit could cause more accidents. I wouldn't feel comfortable sitting in a car without a driver.

6 I understand what James and Mary are saying. However, I believe that although driverless cars sound perfect, there are limitations. For example, if an accident occurs, who is to blame? Do you blame the driver? The car? The car manufacturer? Driving laws are written for human drivers, not robots. Therefore, countries will have to decide who is responsible and write new laws, which won't be easy!

³ I agree with you James. I think this is great technology. All you need to do is tell the computer where you want to go and how you want to drive. Select "cautious" and it will obey the speed limit. Or choose "aggressive" and you can drive faster. I sometimes get tired when I drive. So, having a car that can drive itself is amazing. I can't wait to

⁴ There are a lot of accidents where I live. Some people drive really quickly, and they sometimes use their phones at the same time! Others are very careful. I think hands-free driving will have important benefits. For one, driverless cars can improve safety. Most car accidents are the result of human error. These cars will reduce the number of accidents, and the number of patients I see. I will also be able to control my speed, and avoid getting traffic violations every day on my way to work.

¹ Thanks to modern technology, cars today think for us. GPS navigation systems give people directions without looking at a map. Sensors built into cars sound an alarm if drivers get too close to a person or another vehicle. Now, car companies are building driverless cars that will do all of this, and much more. Driverless cars may sound like science fiction. However, they are already on the roads in some places. We would like to hear your opinion about this. Is this a good thing?

² I think it's fantastic! Technology in cars already helps us a lot. By using GPS, sensors, and cameras together, cars park themselves and control drivers when they're about to make a dangerous turn. The sensors in these new cars will sense turns, red lights, stop signs, and other cars. Their computers will use GPS and other data to drive the car to its destination. This will make the roads safer.
